And here is another gem, from the “20 Questions” with Justice Kay B. Cobb of the Supreme Court of Mississippi:

Bashman: I see that before you became a Justice you served in the Mississippi State Senate. How if at all does having served in the legislative branch influence you in your work as a judge?

Cobb: It helps to have been a part of the law-making process; to have a thorough understanding of that process. It certainly makes it easier to understand why some statutes are so unclear and imprecise. Occasionally I have “flashbacks” to arguments on the floor of the senate when a convoluted bill was passed, and the chairman of a committee would say something to the effect of “don’t worry about the details . . . we’ll let those lawyers and judges figure them out.” However, in the pure sense of the word “influence,” I believe that it has very little effect on my work as a judge. Because our state has very scant records of legislative matters, we basically do not get into the discussion of legislative intent in our opinions construing statutes. Having been in that body, and realizing the misinterpretations which could all too easily be made, I am comfortable with our system.

There is a lot more. Maybe Bashman should put out a best-of book.
