“Then he staggered to his feet and received another shot.”

John H. Watson

Arthur Conan Doyle,
The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton,
The Strand Magazine, Apr. 1904, at 382.

Pictured: Shooting of Charles Augustus Milverton.
ANY FRIENDS OF THE GREEN BAG only recently received the 2014 Green Bag Almanac & Reader, which was very late to appear in print (in November rather than February) for sad and funny reasons recited elsewhere.¹ The Bag is doing better now, which means the 2015 Almanac & Reader should arrive on time, in February. Its theme will be Holmesian, as we announced a few weeks ago in a call for annotations² of “The Adventure of the Norwood Builder.”³ Yes, it is a story that has been republished frequently and studied deeply (and its famous protagonist even more so), but there is no such thing as too much Holmes (at least of the Sherlock variety) and always more to say about him. And it is in that spirit that we offer here a special edition of another Holmes story – “The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton” – as both (1) a reminder of the importance of law in Holmes’s work and in the work of his colleague Dr. John Watson and (2) an example of the kinds of entertaining and thought-provoking Holmesian tidbits readers may look forward to finding in (we hope) every section of the 2015 Almanac & Reader.

¹ See Ross E. Davies, The Capacity to Be Taxed Is the Capacity to Self-Destruct, in 2013 GREEN BAG ALM. 1; Ross E. Davies, Preface, in 2014 GREEN BAG ALM. 1.
² See twitter.com/GB2d/status/525661461566488576; see also page 2 above.
³ Arthur Conan Doyle, The Adventure of the Norwood Builder (1903).
In the course of questing for an obscure 1911 pamphlet edition of “The Adventure of the Norwood Builder” for the Almanac & Reader, my colleague Cattleya Concepcion uncovered a small trove of Holmes pamphlets in the David M. Rubenstein Rare Book and Manuscript Library at Duke University. All are from a series published by the New York World in 1911. Concepcion’s search deserves the full description she gives in the forthcoming Almanac & Reader. For now it is enough to say that she was quite resourceful and the librarians at Duke were superb collaborators. They were also kind enough to scan the pamphlets for us. “The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton,” reproduced on pages 98 to 104 below, is one of them.4 The rest, including the long-sought “Norwood Builder,” will appear in the Almanac & Reader.

FROM BEGINNING TO END, the Holmes-versus-Milverton story is peppered with law.5 At the start, for example, law determines when Watson can tell the story at all.6 (p.98 below) And it is a legal document that Milverton — an infamous blackmailer — is reading moments before his timely end. (p.103) The story also features a distinctive type of lawlessness — at least by modern standards — that runs through the “Canon” (the 60 Holmes stories with an Arthur Conan Doyle byline): a blackmailer is almost always confronted by, and is often killed by, a blackmail victim exerting deadly force.7

6Although it is not clear which “human law” it is that constrains and then releases him. See KLINGER at 167 n.3.

7Eduardo Lucas (The Adventure of the Second Stain) may be an exception (if Hilda Trelawney Hope is to be believed), though it would do him no good. See KLINGER at 306-07, 313-14, 316 & nn.43, 55, 69; Joella D. Hultgren, “The Second Stain
Holmes, Coase & Blackmail

HOMICIDAL ATTACKS BY BLACKMAIL VICTIMS
(to avoid mass spoliation of solutions to mysteries, consequences not given)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>story</th>
<th>blackmailer</th>
<th>victim/attacker(s)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>The Boscombe Valley Mystery</td>
<td>Charles McCarthy</td>
<td>John Turner</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Adventure of the Gloria Scott</td>
<td>Hudson</td>
<td>Beddoes, aka Evans</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Adventure of the Reigate Squire</td>
<td>William Kirwan</td>
<td>the Cunninghams</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Adventure of Black Peter</td>
<td>Patrick Cairns</td>
<td>Peter Carey</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton</td>
<td>Charles Augustus Milverton</td>
<td>an unnamed woman</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Holmes has no objection to victims (at least some of them) killing their blackmailers, as he explains when asked by Inspector Lestrade of Scotland Yard to help search for suspects in the Milverton killing:

“Well, I am afraid I can’t help you, Lestrade,” said Holmes. “The fact is that I knew this fellow Milverton, that I considered him one of the most dangerous men in London, and that I think there are certain crimes which the law cannot touch, and which therefore, to some extent, justify private revenge. No, it’s no use arguing. I have made up my mind. My sympathies are with the criminals rather than with the victim, and I will not handle this case.” (p.104)

Holmes is endorsing vigilantism, a dubious stance for a sophisticated proponent of justice. Had he had access to the scholarship of economist-to-be Ronald Coase, and had he been more mindful of judicial opinion about blackmail in his own day, Holmes might have described the Milverton killing differently.

Start with the simplest of definitions of justifiable homicide in defense of one’s self or someone else:

---

Explained", 52 BAKER ST. J. 41 (Winter 2002); Mary P. De Camara, Holmes’s Level of Moral Thinking, 28 BAKER ST. J. (n.s.) 90, 91 (June 1978). James Moriarty (The Valley of Fear; The Adventure of the Final Problem) is not an exception, because he is identified not as a blackmailer, but merely as “the first link in . . . a chain with this Napoleon-gone-wrong at one end and a hundred broken fighting men, pickpockets, blackmailers, and card-sharpers at the other . . . .” Nor is Irene Adler (A Scandal in Bohemia), because she is not, in fact, a blackmailer. See Paul H. Brundage, In Defense of Irene Adler, 31 BAKER ST. J. (n.s.) 234 (Dec. 1981). There may also be unknown blackmailers with unknown fates. See, e.g., The Hound of the Baskervilles (“At the present instant one of the most revered names in England is being besmirched by a blackmailer, and only I can stop a disastrous scandal.”).
Ross E. Davies

If a party has an apprehension that his or her life is in danger and believes the grounds of his or her apprehension just and reasonable, a homicide committed by that party is in self-defense. A homicide is justifiable and noncriminal where the actor possessed both an actual and reasonable belief in the need to defend himself or herself. . . . Under the theory of the defense of others, one is not guilty of taking the life of an assailant who assaults a friend, relative, or bystander if that friend, relative, or bystander would likewise have the right to take the life of the assailant in self-defense. ⁸

Now consider Coase on blackmail:

In a passage I have already quoted Mr. Bechhofer Roberts says that “blackmail is by many people considered the foulest of crimes – far crueller than most murders, because of its cold-blooded premeditation and repeated torture of the victim.” . . . It is not difficult to understand why people feel this way. . . . [A blackmail victim] cannot appeal to the law, since this would involve that disclosure of facts which he is anxious to avoid. But there is, I believe, another difference, even more important than the others. Business negotiations (which may also cause anxiety) either lead to a breakdown of the negotiations or they lead to a contract. There is, at any rate, an end. But in the ordinary blackmail case there is no end. The victim, once he succumbs to the blackmailer, remains in his grip for an indefinite period. It is moral murder.” ⁹

Moral murder. In the Victorian world of Holmes, Coase’s characterization of blackmail was, at least for some people, more than a rhetorical flourish. It was reality. And those people included judges.

Here is a prominent English judge opining on blackmail, just a few years before “The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton”:

⁹ Ronald H. Coase, Blackmail, 74 VA. L. REV. 655, 674-75 (1988) (citation omitted); cf. Ken Levy, The Solution to the Real Blackmail Paradox, 39 CONN. L. REV. 1051, 1084 (2007) (“Given that reputation may be just as, if not more, socially, economically, and psychologically important to its owner than other [legally protected] interests, a threat to spread reputation-damaging information is arguably more wrongful than a threat to kidnap, steal, defraud, vandalize, or, possibly in some more extreme cases, even kill or maim.”). Coase has his critics, friendly (e.g., James Lindgren, Blackmail: On Waste, Morals, and Ronald Coase, 36 UCLA L. REV. 597 (1989)), and not. E.g., F.E. Guerra-Pujol, The Problem of Blackmail, 5 CRITICAL STUD. J. 1 (2012).
Holmes, Coase & Blackmail

In November 1885, Mr. Justice [Alfred] Wills gave his opinion that ‘he and all Her Majesty’s Judges looked upon offences of this nature as the most serious known to the law’. Persons with weak temperaments ‘had been known to commit suicide in consequence of unfounded charges . . . being made against them’. 10

And here is Milverton’s killer, describing the consequences of his disclosure of her secret: “So you sent the letters to my husband, and he broke his gallant heart and died.” (p.103) 11

So, what does all this mean for Holmes’s response to Lestrade? Perhaps Holmes could have said something like this:

“Well, I am afraid I can’t help you, Lestrade,” said Holmes. “The fact is that I knew this fellow Milverton. He tortured and killed with his cruel methods. His victims – even those who submitted to his demands – could not escape or defend themselves, or know when he would strike. Under his threats, destruction and even death were always imminent. Surely his killer was either defending herself or another from the deadly result she could reasonably anticipate were he to carry out his threat to disclose her secrets, or (if the victim of his disclosure of the killer’s secrets was already dead) defending some other helpless soul from the same fate. My sympathies are with the victims rather than with the criminal, and I will not handle this case.”

It would have jibed with the views expressed by Holmes, Coase, and Wills. And it would have meant an open season on blackmailers.

None of this is to say that killing a blackmailer should or would be justifiable today. It shouldn’t and wouldn’t. But in Holmes’s world, self-defense to Coasian moral murder does seem to have been not just the order of the day for Milverton, but the order of the age.

I may well have missed either an unmolested blackmailer in the Canon, or an earlier observation of the pattern described here. Nevertheless, the problems highlighted are worth considering – what is blackmail? and what, if anything, should be done about it? – by anyone interested in the fates of Milverton and his ilk, and of their victims.

10 Quoted in MIKE HEPWORTH, BLACKMAIL: PUBLICITY AND SECRECY IN EVERYDAY LIFE 15 & 105 n.26 (1975) (citing THE TIMES [London], Nov. 19, 1885).

I am years since the incidents of which I speak took place, and yet it is with diffidence that I allude to them. For a long time, even with the utmost discretion and reticence, it would have been impossible to make the facts public, but now the principal person concerned is beyond the reach of human law, and with due suppression the story may be told with such fashion as to injure no one. It records an absolutely unique experience in the career both of Mr. Sherlock Holmes and of myself. The reader will excuse me if I conceal the date or any other fact by which he might trace the actual occurrence.

We had been out for one of our evening rambles, Francis and I, and had returned about six o’clock on a cold, frosty, winter’s evening. As Holmes turned up the lamp the light fell upon a card on the table. He glanced at it, and then, with an ejaculation of disgust, threw it on the floor. I picked it up and read:

CHARLES AUGUSTUS MILFERTON,
APPLEDORE TOWERS,
HEMPSTEAD,

“Who is he?” I asked.

“The worst man in London,” Holmes answered, as he sat down and stretched his legs before the fire. “Is anything on the back of the card?”

I turned it over.

“Here! Help about due. Do you feel a creeping, deathly sensation, Watson, when you stand before the temples in the Zoo, and see the siltarry, ghastly, venomous creatures, with their deadly eyes and wicked, flattened faces? Well, that’s how Milverton impresses me. I’ve had to do with fifty murderers in my career, but the worst of them never gave me the repulsion which I have for this fellow. And yet I can’t get out of doing business with him—indeed, he is here at my invitation.”

“But who is he?”

“I’ll tell you, Watson. He is the king of all the blackguards. Heaven help the man, and still more the woman, whose secret and reputation come into the power of Milverton! With a smiling face and a heart of marble, he will squeeze and squeeze until he has drained them dry. The fellow is a genius in his way, and would have made his mark in some more savory trade. His method is as follows. He allows it to be known that he is prepared to pay very high sums for letters which compromise people of wealth and position. He receives these wares not only from treacherous vatsols or maids, but frequently from gentle ruffians, who have gained the confidence and affection of trusting women. He deals with no negligent hand. I happen to know that he paid seven hundred pounds to a footman for a note two lines in length, and that the ruin of a noble lady was the result. Everything which is in the market goes to Milverton, and there are hundreds in this great city who turn white at his name.

No one knows where his grip may fall, for he is far too rich and far too cunning to work from hand to mouth. He will hold a card back for years in order to play it at the moment when the stake is best worth winning. I have said that he is the worst man in London, and I would ask you how could one compare the ruffian, who in hot blood bludgeons his mate, with this man, who methodically and at his leisure tortures the soul and wrings the nerves in order to add to his already swollen money bag?”

I had seldom heard my friend speak with such intensity of feeling.

“But surely,” said I, “the fellow must be within the grasp of the law?”

“Technically, no doubt, but practically not. What would it profit a woman, for example, to get him a few months’ imprisonment, if her own ruin must immediately follow? His victims dare not hit back. Even if he blackmailed an innocent person, then indeed we should have him, but he is as cunning as the Evil One. No, no, we must find other ways to fight him.”

“And why is he here?”

“Because an illustrious client has placed her priceless case in my hands. It is the Lady Eva Blackwell, the most beautiful débutante of last season. She is to be married in a fortnight to the Earl of Dovercourt. This fellow has several impudent letters—impudent, Watson, nothing worse—which were written to an impudent young suitor in the country. They would suffice to break off the match. Milverton will send the letters to the Earl unless a large sum of money is paid him. I have been commissioned to meet him, and—to make the best terms I can.”

At that instant there was a clatter and a rattle in the street below. Looking down I saw a stately carriage and pair, the brilliant lamps gleaming on the glossy harnesses of the noble chestnuts. A footman opened the door, and
The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton

The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton was a man of fifty, with a large, intellectual head, a round, plump, hairless face, a perpetual, frozen smile, and two keen grey eyes, which gleamed brightly from behind bespectacled, oval-rimmed glasses.

There was something of Mr. Pickwick's benevolence in his appearance, marred only by the inscrutability of the fixed smile and by the hard glitter of those restless and penetrating eyes. His voice was as smooth and suave as his countenance, as he advanced with a placid little hand extended, muttering his regret for having missed us at his first visit. Holmes disregarded the outstretched hand and looked at him with a face of granite. Milverton's smile broaden, he shrugged his shoulders, removed his overcoat, folded it with great deliberation over the back of a chair, and then took a seat.

"This gentleman?" said he, with a wave in my direction. "Is it discreet? Is it right?"

"Dr. Watson is my friend and partner."

Very good, Mr. Holmes. It is only in your client's interests that I protested. The matter is so very delicate."

"Dr. Watson has already heard of it."

"Then we can proceed to business. You say that you are seeking for Lady Eva. Has she empowered you to accept my terms?"

"What are your terms?"

"Seven thousand pounds."

"And the alternative?"

"My dear sir, it is painful for me to discuss it, but if the money is not paid on the 14th there certainly will be no marriage on the 18th."

"Insufferable smile was more complacent than ever.

Holmes thought for a little.

"You appear to me," he said, at last, "to be taking matters too much for granted. I am, of course, familiar with the contents of these letters. My client will certainly do what I may advise. I shall counsel her to tell her future husband the whole story and to trust to his generosity."

Milverton chuckled.

"You evidently do not know the Earl," said he. From the baffled look upon Holmes's face I could see clearly that he did.

"What harm is there in the letters?" he asked.

"They are sprightly—very sprightly," Milverton answered. "The lady was a charming correspondent. But I can assure you that the Earl of Dovercourt would fail to appreciate them. However, since you think otherwise, we will let it rest at that. It is purely a matter of business. I think that it is in the best interests of your client that these letters should be placed in the hands of the Earl, then you would indeed be foolish to pay so large a sum of money to retain them." He rose and seized his astrakhan coat.

Holmes was gray with anger and mortification.

"Wait a little," he said. "You go too fast. We should certainly make every effort to avoid scandal in so delicate a matter."

Milverton relapsed into his chair.

"I was sure that you would see it in that light," he said.

"At the same time," Holmes continued, "Lady Eva is not a wealthy woman. I assure you that two thousand pounds would be a drain upon her resources and that the sum you name is utterly beyond her power. I beg, therefore, that you will moderate your demands, as for you will return the letters at the price I indicated, viz., I assure you, the highest that you can get."

Milverton's smile broadened and his eyes twinkled humorously.

"I am aware that what you say is true about the lady's resources," said he. "At the same time you must admit that the occasion of a lady's marriage is a very suitable time for her friends and relatives to make her little effort upon her behalf. They may hesitate to turn an acceptable wedding present. Let me assure you that this little bundle of letters would give more joy to the candelabra and butter dishes in London."

"It is impossible," said Holmes.

"Dear me, dear me, how unfortunate!" cried Milverton, taking out a bulky pocketbook. "I cannot say, thinking that ladies are ill-advised in not making us offers. Look at this!" He held up a little note with a misspelt arm upon the envelope. "That belongs to—oh, I hope it is hardly fair to tell the name until tomorrow morning. But at that time it will be in the hands of the lady's husband. And all because she will not sign a begging sum which she could get by turning her face into paste. It is such a pity! Now, you remember the sudden end of the engagement between the Hon. Miss Miles and Colonel Dorking? Only two days before the wedding there was a paragraph in the Morning Post to say that it was all off. And why? It is not to credulous, but the absurd sum of twelve hundred pounds would have settled the whole question. Is it not?"

And here I find you, a man of sense, begging about this when your client's future and honor are at stake. You surprise me, Mr. Holmes."

"What I say is true," Holmes answered. "Turner cannot be found. Surely it is better for you to take a substantial sum which I offer than to ruin this young man's career, which can profit you in no way?"

"There you make a mistake, Mr. Holmes. A sum so puny would not profit me indirectly at all. I have eight or ten similar cases maturing. It was circulated among them that I had made a case like the example of the Lady Eva I should find all of them more open to reason. You see my point?

Holmes sprang from his chair.

"Get behind him, Watson! Don't let him out! Now, sir, let us see the contents of that note book.

Milverton had glided as quick as a rat to the side of the room, and stood with his back against the wall.

"Mr. Holmes, Mr. Holmes," he said, turning into that of his coat and exhibiting the but of a large revolver which projected from the inside pocket. "I have been waiting upon you to do something original. This has been too long, and what good has ever come from it? I saw you that I am armed to the teeth, and I am perfectly prepared to use my weapons, knowing that the law will not me. Besides, your supposition that I would for the letters here in a note book is entirely mistaken. I would do nothing so foolish. And now, gentlemen, I have one or two little interviews this evening, and it is a long drive to Hampstead."

He stepped forward, took up his coat, laid his hand on his revolver, and turned to the door. I picked up a chair, but Holmes shook his head, and turned it down again. With a bow, a smile, and a slightly, Milverton was out of the room, and a few moments after
Arthur Conan Doyle

The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton

“You can’t help it, my dear Watson. You must play your cards as best you can when such a stake is on the table. However, I rejoice to say that I have a hated rival, who will certainly cut me out the instant that my back is turned. What a splendid night it is!”

“You like this weather?”

“It suits my purpose. Watson, I mean to burglary Milverton’s house to-night.”

I had a catching of the breath and my skin went cold at the words, which were slowly uttered in a tone of concentrated resolution. As a flash of lightning in the night shews up in an instant every detail of a wild landscape, so at one glance I seemed to see every possible result of such an action—the detection, the capture, the honored career ending in irreparable failure and disgrace, my friend himself lying at the mercy of the odious Milverton.

“For Heaven’s sake, Holmes, think what you are doing,” I cried.

“My dear fellow, I have given it every consideration. I am never precipitate in my actions, nor would I adopt so energetic a step, and indeed so dangerous a course, if any other were possible. Let us look at the matter clearly and fairly. I suppose that you will admit that the action is morally justifiable, though technically criminal. To burglary his house is no more than to forcibly take his pocket-book—an action in which you were prepared to aid me.”

I turned it over in my mind.

“Yes,” I said, “it is morally justifiable so long as our object is to take no article save those which are used for an illegal purpose.”

“Exactly. Since it is morally justifiable, I have only to consider the question of personal risk. Surely a gentleman should not lay much stress upon this, when a helper is in most desperate need of his help?”

“You will be in such a false position.”

“Well, that is part of the risk. There is no other posi-
THE RETURN OF SHERLOCK HOLMES

A

The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton

ABLE WAY OF REGAINING THESE LETTERS. THE UNFORTUNATE LADY HAS NOT THE MONEY, AND THERE ARE NONE OF HER PEOPLE IN WHOM SHE COULD CONFIDE. TO-MORROW IS THE LAST DAY OF GRACE, AND UNLESS WE CAN GET THE LETTERS TO-NIGHT, THIS VILLAIN WILL BE AS GOOD AS HIS WORD AND BRING ABOUT HER RUIN. I MUST, THEREFORE, ABANDON MY CLIENT TO HER FATE OR I MUST PLAY THIS LAST CARD. BETWEEN OURSELVES, WATSON, IT’S A SPORTING DUET BETWEEN THIS FELLOW MILVERTON AND ME. HE HAD, AS YOU SAW, THE BEST OF THE FIRST EXCHANGES, BUT MY SELF-RESPECT AND MY REPUTATION ARE CONCERNED TO FIGHT IT TO A FINISH.”

“WELL, I DON’T LIKE IT, BUT I SUPPOSE IT MUST BE,” SAID I. “WHEN DO WE START?”

“I AM NOT COMING.”

“THEN YOU ARE NOT GOING,” SAID I. “I GIVE YOU MY WORD OF HONOR—AND I NEVER BREAK IT IN MY LIFE—that I will take a cab straight to the police station and give you away, unless you let me share this adventure with you.”

“You CAN’T HELP ME.”

“How DO YOU KNOW THAT? YOU CAN’T TELL WHAT MAY HAPPEN. ANYWAY, MY RESOLUTION IS TAKEN. OTHER PEOPLE DESIRE YOU TO HAVE SELF-RESPECT AND EVEN REPUTATIONS.”

MILVERTON HAD LOOKED ANNOYED, BUT HIS BROW CLEARED, AND HE CLAPPED ME ON THE SHOULDER.

“Well, well, my dear fellow, be it so. We have shared this room some years, and it would be amusing if we shared the same cell. You know, Watson, I don’t mind confessing to you that I have always had an idea that I would make a highly efficient criminal. This is the chance of my lifetime in that direction. See here!”

He took a neat little leather case out of a drawer, and opening it he exhibited a number of shining instruments. “This is a first-class, up-to-date burgling kit, with nickel plated jimmy, diamond tipped glasscutter, adaptable keys and every modern improvement which the march of civilisation demands. Here, too, is my dark ladder. Everything is in order. Have you a pair of silent shoes?”

“I HAVE RUBBER SOLED TRAINS SHOES.”

“EXCELLENT! AND A MASK?”

“I CAN MAKE A COUPLE OUT OF BLACK SILK.”

“I CAN SEE THAT YOU HAVE A STRONG, NATURAL TURN FOR THIS KIND OF THING. VERY GOOD, DO YOU MAKE THE MASKS. WE SHALL HAVE SOME COLD SUPPER BEFORE WE START. IT IS NOW ONE-THIRTY. AT ELEVEN WE SHALL DRIVE AS FAR AS CHURCH ROW. IT IS A QUARTER OF AN HOUR’S WALK FROM THERE TO APPLEDORE TOWERS. WE SHALL BE AT WORK BEFORE MIDNIGHT. MILVERTON IS A HEAVY SLEEPER AND RETIRES POINTUALLY AT TEN-THIRTY. WITH ANY LUCK, WE SHOULD BE BACK HERE BY TWO WITH THE LADY EVANS’ LETTERS IN MY POCKET.”

Holmes and I put on our dress clothes so that we might appear to be two theatrical-gentlemen homeward bound. In Oxford street we picked up a hansom and drove to an address in Hampstead. Here we paid off our cab, and with our great coats buttoned up, for it was bitterly cold and the wind seemed to blow through us, we walked along the edge of the heath.

“IT’S A BUSINESS THAT NEEDS DELICATE TREATMENT,” SAID Holmes. “These documents are contained in a safe in the fellow’s study and the study is the ante-room of his bedroom. On the other hand, like all these stout, little men, they do themselves no harm. He is a plumpish sleeper. Agatha—that is my fiancée—will not let it be a joke in the servants’ hall that it is impossible to wake the miser. He has a secretary who is devoted to his interests and never flinches from the study all day. That’s why we are going at night. Then he has a beast of a dog which guards the garden. I met Agatha late the last two evenings, and she locks the brute up so as to give me a clear run. We are in the house, this big one in its own grounds. Through the gate—now to the right among the laurels. We shall put on our masks here. I think you see, there is a glimmer of light in any of the windows, and everything is working splendidly.”

With our black silk face coverings, which blend into two of the most transparent figures in London, we set up to the silent, gloomy house. A sort of veranda is tended along one side of it, lined by several windows and two doors.

“That’s his bedroom,” Holmes whispered. “The door opens straight into the study. It would set us out, but it is bolted as well as locked, and we should make much noise getting in. Come round here. There’s a greenhouse which opens into the drawing-room.”

The place was locked, but Holmes removed a side of glass and turned the key from the inside. An instant afterwards he had closed the door behind us and Sat become fierce in the eyes of the law. The thick, warm air of the conservatory and the rich, choking fragrance of exotic plants took us by the throat. He winding hard in the darkness and led us swiftly past the halls of shrubs which brushed against our faces. Holmes had remarked powers, carefully cultivated, of using his dark. Still holding my hand in one of his, he spied a door, and I was vaguely conscious that we had entered a large room in which a cigar had been smoked very recently before. He felt his way among the furniture, opened another door, and closed it behind us. Putting my hand he felt several coats hanging from the wall, and I understood that I was in a passage. We passed along and Holmes very gently opened a door upon the right hand side. Something rushed out of the wall and up my nose, and spung onto my mouth, but I could have laughed if I realized that it was the cat. There was silence for a moment, and again the air was heavy with tobacco smoke. Holmes entered on tiptoe, waited for me to follow and then very gently closed the door. We were in Milverton’s study, and a portiere at the farther side showed entrance to his bedroom.

It was a good fire and the room was illuminated by the light of it. Near the door I saw the gleam of an electric flexible, but it was unnecessary, even if it had been left to turn it on. At one side of the fire-place was a heavy curtain which had covered the bay window we had seen from the outside. On the other side was the door which communicated with the veranda. A dark stood in the room, with a turning-chair of shining red leather. Opposite was a large bookcase, with a marble bust of Athena at the top. In the corner, between the bookcase and the wall, there stood a tall, green, safe, the firelight flitted back from the polished brass knob upon its face. Faster and faster it turned across and locked at it. Then he crept to the door of the bedroom, and stood with slackened head looking intently. No sound came from within. Meanwhile I had struck me that he would be wise to secure our way through the outer door, so I examined it. To my great excitement, it was neither locked nor bolted. I pushed it back on the arm, and he turned his masked face in the direction. I saw him start, and he was evidently as surprised as I.

“SOMETHING’S THE MATTER, MY DEAR MAN,” HE WHISPERED, PUTTING UP HIS RIFLE.
Arthur Conan Doyle

THE ADVENTURE OF CHARLES AUGUSTUS MILVERTON

"Can I do anything?"

"Yes, stand by the door. If you hear any one come, hold it on the inside, and we can get away as we came. If they come the other way, we can get through the door if the job is done, or hide behind these window curtains if it is not. Do you understand?"

I nodded and stood by the door. My first feeling of fear had passed away, and I thrilled now with a keener zest than I had ever enjoyed when we were the defenders of the law instead of its offenders. The high object of our mission, the consciousness that it was unselfish and chivalrous, the villainous character of our opponent, all added to the sporting interest of the adventure. Far from feeling guilty, I rejoiced and excited in our dangers.

With a glow of admiration I watched Holmes unrolling his case of instruments and choosing his tools with the calm, scientific accuracy of a surgeon who performs a delicate operation. I knew that the opening of ileus was a particular hobby with him, and I understood the joy which it gave him to be confronted with this green and gullible monster, the dragon which held in its maw the reputations of many fair ladies. Turning up the cuffs of his dress coat—he had placed his overcoat on a chair—Holmes laid out two drills, a jimmy and several skeleton keys. I stood at the centre door with my eyes glancing at each of the others, ready for any emergency, though, indeed, my plans were somewhat vague as to what I should do if we were interrupted. For half an hour Holmes worked with concentrated energy, laying down one tool picking up another, handling each with the strength and deftness of the trained mechanic. Finally I heard a click, the broad green door swung open, and inside I had a glimpse of a number of paper packets, each tied, sealed and inscribed. Holmes picked one out, but it was hard to read by the flickering fire, and he drew out his little dark lantern, for it was too dangerous, with Milverton in the next room, to switch on the electric light. Suddenly I saw him halt, listen intently, and then in an instant he had swung the door of the safe to, picked up his coat, stuffed his tools into the pockets and darted behind the window curtain, motioning me to do the same.

It was only when I had joined him there that I heard what had alarmed his quicker senses. There was a noise somewhere within the house. A door slammed in the distance. Then a confused, dull murmur broke itself into the measured thud of heavy footsteps rapidly approaching. They were in the passage outside the room. They paused at the door. The door opened. There was a sharp snick as the electric light key turned on. The door closed once more and the pungent smell of a strong cigar was borne to our nostrils. Then the footsteps continued backward and forward, backward and forward, within a few yards of us. Finally there was a creak from a chair and the footsteps ceased. Then a key clicked in a lock and I heard the rustle of papers.

So far I had not dared to lock out, but now I gently parted the division of the curtain in front of me and peeped through. From the pressure of Holmes’s shoulder against mine I knew that he was sharing my observations. Right in front of us, and almost within our reach, was the broad, rounded back of Milverton. It was evident that we had entirely misestimated his movements, that he had never been in his bedroom, but that he had been sitting.
The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton

The Return of Sherlock Holmes

up in some smoking or billiard room in the farther wing of the house, the windows of which we had not seen. His broad, grizzled head, with its shining patch of baldness, was in the immediate foreground of our vision. He was leaning far back in the red leather chair, his legs outstretched, a long, black cigar protruding at an angle from his mouth. He wore a semi-military smoking jacket, claret colored, with a black velveteen collar. In his hand he held a long, legal document which he was reading in an indolent fashion, blowing rings of tobacco smoke from his lips as he did so. There was no promise of a speedy departure in his composed bearing and his comfortable attitude.

I felt Holmes’s hand steal into mine and give me a reassuring shake, as if to say that the situation was within his powers, and that he was easy in his mind. I was not sure whether he had seen what was only too obvious from my position, that the door of the safe was imperfectly closed, and that Milverton might at any moment observe it. In my own mind I had determined that if I were sure, from the rigidity of his gaze, that it had caught his eye, I would spring out, throw my greatcoat over his head, pounce him and leave the rest to Holmes. But Milverton never looked up. He was languidly interested by the papers in his hand, and page after page was turned as he followed the argument of the lawyer. At least, I thought, when he had finished the document and the cigar he will go to his room, but before he had reached the end of either there came a remarkable development, which turned our thoughts into quite another channel.

Several times I had observed that Milverton looked at his watch, and once he had risen and sat down again, with a gesture of impatience. The idea, however, that he might have an appointment at so strange an hour never occurred to me until a faint sound reached my ears from the veranda outside. Milverton dropped his papers and sat rigid in his chair. The sound was repeated, and then there came a gentle tap at the door. Milverton arose and opened it.

“Well,” said he, curiously, “you are nearly half an hour late.”

So this was the explanation of the unlocked door and of the nocturnal vigil of Milverton. There was the gentle rustle of a woman’s dress. I had closed the slit between the curtains as Milverton’s face had turned toward me, but now I ventured very carefully to open it once more. He had resumed his seat, the cigar still projecting at an insolent angle from the corner of his mouth. In front of him, in the full glare of the electric light, there stood a tall, slim, dark woman, a veil over her face, a mantilla drawn round her chin. Her breath came quick and fast, and every inch of the little figure was quivering with strong emotion.

“Well,” said Milverton, “you’ve made me lose a good night’s rest, my dear. I hope you’ll prove worth it. You couldn’t come any other time—eh?”

The woman shook her head.

“Well, if you couldn’t you couldn’t.” If the Countess is a hard mistress, you have your chance to get level with her now. Bless the girl, what are you SHIPPING about? That’s right. Pull yourself together. Now, let us get down to business.” He took a note book from the drawer of his desk. “You say that you have five letters which compromise the Countess of Albert. You want to sell them. I want to buy them. So far so good. It only remains to fix a price. I should want to inspect the letters, of course. If they are really good—specimen—great heavens, is it you?”

The woman, without a word, had raised her veil and dropped the mantle from her chin. It was a dark, handsome, clever, erect face which confronted Milverton—a face with a curved nose, strong, dark eyebrows shading hard, glittering eyes, and a straight, thin-lipped mouth set in a dangerous smile.

“It is I,” she said, “the woman whose life you have ruined.”

Milverton laughed, but fear vibrated in his voice.

“You were so very obstinate,” said he. “Why did you drove me to such extremities? I assure you I wouldn’t have a fly of my own accord have harmed you or his busi- ness, and what was I to do? I put the price well within your means. You would not pay.”

“So you sent the letters to my husband, and hehke his gallant heart and died. You remember that last night, how I came through that door, and begged and prayed for mercy, and you laughed in my face as you were trying to laugh now, only your coward heart cannot keep your lips from twitching? Yes, you never thought to see me here again, but it was that night which taught me how I could meet you face to face, and alive. Well, Charles Milverton, what have you to say?”

“Don’t imagine that you can bully me,” said he, rising to his feet. I have only to raise my voice, and I could call my servants and have you arrested. But I will make allowance for your natural anger. Leave the room at once as you came, and I will say no more.”

The woman stood with her hand buried in her bosom, and the same deadly smile on her thin lips.

“You will ruin no more lives as you have ruined this. You will wring no more hearts as you wrong mine. I tell the world of a poisonous thing. Take that, you beast—and that—and that—and that!”

She had drawn a little glowing revolver, and emptied barrel after barrel into Milverton’s body, the muzzle within two feet of his shirt front. He slunk away and then fell forward upon the table, coughing furiously and clawing among the papers. Then he staggered to his feet, received another shot, and rolled upon the floor. “You’ve done,” he cried, and die still. The woman took the rapt face, and her veil and her mantilla, and her black eyes, and her hair, and her life, and the house, and the world.”

The revolver shots had roused the household. With perfect composure Holmes slipped across to the safe, flung his two arms with bundles of letters, andPearced them all into the “Good morning, Mr. Holmes,” said he; “good morning. May I ask if you are very busy just now?”

“Not too busy to listen to you.”

“I thought that, perhaps, if you had nothing particular on hand you might care to assist us in a most remarkable case, which occurred only last night at Hampstead.”

“Dear me!” said Holmes. “What was that?”

“A murder—a most dramatic and remarkable murder. I know how keen you are upon these things, and I would take it as a great favor if you would step down to Appleford Towers and give us the benefit of your advice. It is an ordinary crime. We have had our eyes upon this Milverton for some time, and, between ourselves, he was a bit of a villain. He is known to have held papers which he used for blackmailing purposes. These papers have all been burned by the murderers. No article of value was taken, as it is probable that the criminals were men of good position, whose sole object was to prevent social exposure.”

“Criminals!” said Holmes. “Plural?”

“Yes, there were two of them. We have their footmarks, we have their description, it’s ten to one that we trace them. The first fellow was a bit too active, but the second was caught by the under gardener, and only got away after a struggle. He was a middle-sized, strongly built man—square jaw, thick neck, moustache, a mark over his eyes.”

“That’s rather vague,” said Sherlock Holmes. “Why it might be a description of Watson!”

“It’s true,” said the inspector, with amusement. “It might be a description of Watson.”

“Well, I’m afraid I can’t help you, Lestrade,” said Holmes. “The fact is that I know this fellow Milverton, that I considered him one of the most dangerous men in London, and that I think there are certain crimes which the law cannot touch, and which therefore, to some extent, justify private revenge. No, it’s no use arguing. I have made up my mind. My sympathies are with the criminals rather than with the victim, and I will not handle this case.”

Holmes had not said one word to me about the tragedy which we had witnessed, but I observed all the morning that he was in his most thoughtful mood, and he gave me the impression, from his vacant eyes and his abstracted manner, of a man who is striving to recall something to his memory. We were in the middle of our lunch, when he suddenly sprang to his feet. “By Jove, Watson, I’ve got it!” he cried. “Take your hat! Come with me!” He hurried at his top speed down Baker street and along Oxford street until we had almost reached Regent Circus. Here, on the left hand, there stands a shop window filled with photographs of the celebrities and beauties of the day. Holmes’s eyes fixed themselves upon one of them, and following his gaze I saw the picture of a regal and stately lady in court dress, with a high diamond tiara upon her noble head. I looked at that delicately curved nose, at the marked eyebrows, at the straight mouth and the strong little chin beneath it. Then I caught my breath as I read the time honored title of the great nobleman and statesman whose wife she had been. My eyes met those of Holmes, and he put his finger to his lips as we turned away from the window.